JOB MARKET PAPER

Energy Shocks, Employment Response, and Heterogeneous Credit Access with Armando Rangel Colina (Central Bank of Mexico)

Award: Selected for the Programa de Verano 2025 by the Central Bank of Mexico.

Abstract: How do firms adjust when energy costs rise sharply, and what role does access to credit play? I study a natural experiment in which electricity-price spikes hit Mexican municipalities with sharply different intensity, linking credit-registry and employer–employee records to an original firm survey fielded by the Central Bank of Mexico. A dynamic structural model of labor and energy substitution under a working-capital constraint, disciplined by these data, shows that higher energy prices raise employment at larger formal firms, that this response is weaker where firms had prior access to credit, and that exposed firms accumulate leverage and shrink their asset base over time. Survey evidence indicates that firms reorganize toward off-peak production and replace energy-intensive machinery. In the aggregate the adjustment is reallocative, shifting activity from small informal firms toward larger formal survivors.
